

I graduated in June 2015 from EEBL.

After that, I moved to the US to start a PhD in Economics at Boston University. The PhD is an incredibly tough but amazing experience, and Boston is probably the ideal place to be for a prospective economist. Every day, I get the chance to learn from the very best economists in the world, cross the river and go to take a class in Harvard or MIT, and interact with people from all over the globe who share the same passion as mine. I am currently focusing on research in Public Economics, with a special focus on income inequality, Intergenerational mobility and Redistributive preferences. This summer, I will come back to Rome to spend 3 months doing research in the Bank of Italy thanks to a research fellowship.

I want to share a message with the new incoming students in the course: nothing is out of your reach, if you really want to get it!

I started from a bachelor in Political Science, and then moved to Tor Vergata at MSc in EEBL. There, thanks to great professors who believed in me and told me about their experience, I started getting passionate about research and realized I wanted to go for a PhD, and here I am now! I really want to thank all the people in the MSc and all the professors who helped me in building my way up to here.
